“An effective business model focused on the synergy of online and offline sales channels combined with customer-oriented price policy and continuous improvement of additional services allowed M.Video to show positive sales dynamics on a saturated market. M.Video was able to attract a new pool of digital equipment and content buyers and to increase the effectiveness of our network, including online. As a result, the company has compensated negative market trends in early 2017, showing growth both in the quarter and in six months of 2017”, - president of M.Video Alexander Tynkovan noted.

“Although Russian sales of household appliances and electronics demonstrates some revival in the spring and summer months due to the growth of purchasing on the back of prices reduction, nevertheless the market remains still and has stable demand, so we forecast growth of sales of consumer electronics in Russia in 2017 by 1-2%", - Mr. Tynkovan added.

"M.Video in the first months of this year launched a number of projects that significantly expanded the company's ability to provide the best service in the market in the omnichannel format. Mobile tablets which our sellers started to use first time on the market allow M.Video to offer customers personalized service and the best prices. The new format of consumer credits in M.Video stores and on the website significantly accelerated the registration process, in addition, our customers receive credit approval 1.3 times more often than the average for the market. Qualitatively new approach to sales and service allows M.Video to increase its presence in all channels and in key markets, - said the chief executive officer of M.Video Enrique Fernandez.

M.Video opened three new stores in H1 2017 (including two new stores in Q2 2017), while closed one store due to its relocation. The total number of the company's stores amounts to 400 in 165 cities of Russia as of the end of H1 2017.
